Our march was a rapid and fatiguing one, with short steps, fow and far between, and the day was hot and sultry from early morning until 39 o'clock p. m., when we halted at Chamcellorsville, moved forward into line of battle to the right, and threw out our picket line. All were foot-sore and weary, especially our recruits, after the forced march of 27 miles, and our mass, like most others drank our hot coffee with our hard tack" and fried ham, and then had down to delicious sleep and pleasant dreams among the Rebeigraves on the old Chamcellorsville battle-field. The next morning, before the first streams of daylight appeared, we were aroused, and as soon as we found time to stow away a little breakfast, we were ngain on the march for Todd's Corners. The day was very warm and suitry, but our pace was rather accelerated than abated, and at 1 o'clock we reached the "Corners." One by one the men were pierced by the enemy's bullets, either wounded or killed outright. Not a groan or cry escaped one of them, but in the calm possession of every faculty, they would turn to an efficer and coolly say. "I am wounded," and then pass, or be carried to the rear. One instance I would mention, I saw a corporal in the ranks of my company wounded in the leg, while in the act of loading his gan, he deliberately aimed his piece and fired, exclaising "Take that," he then turned and said. "Lieutenant, I am wounded and can do no more." He went to the field hospital and had his stand dressed, and soon after came back to the line, saybe, "I must have mother pop at the raseals." That corporal must be promoted. It was in this cross fire that I was wounded, and a close call it was too. I felt the ball strike and the next I knew was, that, dizzy and weak, I raised myself of
